

I believe community service should be a job perk.

In researching my first job after college I'm looking for what's best for me. But I'm also looking for a company I respect. A company committed to giving back and changing people's lives for the better.

I talked to some Enterprise employees and was glad to learn that it's not just about work; they're encouraged to get out in the community, volunteer their time and make a real difference. And the best part is that all their good work is backed by a company that's committed to being a positive force in people's lives and the communities it serves.

What company will I start my management career with?

I believe this one.
